To Whom It May Concern:

I am pleased to write this letter of warm commendation for David Mullaney who has been my student in three courses in the past two years at Wesley Theological Seminary.

David's academic work has been generally excellent, very literate, always thoughtful, often very original. In our National Capital Semester for Seminarans (NCSS) Program last semester -- a program which involves encounters with many government officials, academicians, and leaders of nongovernmental organizations -- he was always well-prepared and quite articulate. Although the youngest person in the program, he assumed some major burdens of leadership and handled them very responsibly.

One cannot know David very long without discovering his strong sense of vocation in matters of justice and peace. He has developed a steady and knowledgeable focus on the combination of Latin American studies, human rights, and liberation theology. At Wesley Seminary, he has been the active and imaginative director of the Liberation Resource Center and a ringleader in computer affairs.

David's personal qualities include a very sensitive and compassionate spirit, a lively sense of humor, and a tendency to assertiveness. He is collegial and a group builder.

I have no hesitation in recommending David Mullaney for any program or position for which his education and experience are appropriate.

Yours sincerely,
